Abstract: I would like to study more about the link between overweight and obesity and lower socioeconomic status. It makes sense that there would tend to be lower levels of exercise and health practices and nutrition among groups with lower socioeconomic status but I think that other factors of differences in culture might be as important as general knowledge about health. I think families with lower socioeconomic status probably have less supervision of children in all areas, including areas of eating and physical activity. I also think parents might see parents being home to eat with their children and involving healthy eating patterns is important. I hypothesize that some of the stressors of having lower socioeconomic status put pressure on parents and children in these situations such that having healthy eating and physical activity practices are much further down in their hierarchy of goals. Parents might want their children to eat well by monitoring other parts of their and their children's lives and may have little involvement in everyday care and teaching of their children's lives when parents from high socioeconomic status backgrounds would have more other worries and thus be able to focus on raising their children to have about and practice healthy behavior regarding food and physical activity.
